The case in discussion is a 32 yr old male patient who presented with recurrent respiratory infections, chronic sinusitis and infertility. He was married for the last six years. While performing a chest X ray, it was seen that the apex of the heart was directed towards the right. An abdominal CT scan showed the location of the spleen in the right upper quadrant.

Defect in the following is responsible for the unusual location of the spleen in this patient:

- a ) Dynein
- b ) Actin
- c ) Myosin
- d ) Kinesin
- e ) Rho kinase

Correct Answer: a

Category: Anatomy

Topic: Right Left Asymmetry And Cellular Mechanisms

All users average for this question: 100%

Explanation

The patient described here is that of Kartagener syndrome.

Many cases are sporadic in occurrence and represent recessive inheritance, but occasional dominant transmission has been reported. Many patients with Kartagener syndrome have complete situs inversus. Mutations in both dynein intermediate chains and dynein heavy chains have been demonstrated in some families with Kartagener syndrome, providing the molecular link between the structural ciliary defects in Kartagener syndrome and specific ciliary proteins. This shows that ciliary movement is
